

George S. Nickerson, one of Nelly's sons, sitting in the cockpit of his BT-13 at the old airfield in North Eastham in the late 1940's or early 50's. George served in the Coast Guard during the Second World War and saw action in the South Pacific. Decorated for his distinguished battle record, he came home from the war excited about flying and determined to buy an old war surplus airplane. He did and here is a poem written by Nelly on May 8, 1947, after she had taken her first plane ride:

The dreary days were getting me down,
A whole week of clouds and rain.
It seemed as though the stars were weeping,
The sun would never shine again.

I went up to the local Airport,
Wondering if they were disgusted too,
To my surprise, my son greeted me,
"Come on up, Mom, for a wondrous view."

So I climbed into his B.T. - 13.
Fastened the earphones under my chin,
Fastened the belt around my waist,
Then the plexiglass cover, closed me in.

Up, up, we soared, away on high,
Through clouds, black as night,
Till we reached fifteen hundred feet,
Then -- suddenly, burst into sight

The most wonderful, gorgeous picture,
No artist ever could make.
I stared, I gasped, mouth wide open,
Pinched myself to see if I were awake

All clouds were gone. It was another world,
The sun, to the left, dazzlingly bright,
Shadow of the plane's wing, thrown onto
A vast field of blown cotton, to my right.

Did you ever go down, in the wintertime,
To see the snow-capped ice, in the bay,
With the sunset off in the distance?
Well, you can picture it also, that way.

It seemed as though I could step off the plane
And walk in that field so white,
I'm glad I didn't, because just then
My pilot said, "We're going down, sit tight."

I looked around and wondered how
He would know where to break through,
But soon descended a pocket through which
The ocean came into view.

We shot right down into clouds again,
Turned around, wings on end,
Taxied down the broad runway,
Lo, -- my feet were on land, again.

I have tried hard to describe to you
About that trip, but it would seem,
There aren't words in any language
Could do it justice, -- it's like a dream.

Whenever skies are cloudy or
Your life seems all trouble and care,
Fly up, way up, -- you'll find the sun
And "That Beautiful Land of Somewhere."
